environmental history of Chatthin Wildlife Sanctuary, a

Abstract: We reconstructed the history of Chatthin Wildlife Sanctuary (CWS) to understand how social and economic events, and policy changes affected the sanctuary's condition.
We surveyed 25 villages surrounding CWS to evaluate past and present ecological conditions, compare the results with historical accounts and identify causal relationships. During the first half of the 20th century, the primary threat was the government's reduction of old growth forest to supply fuel wood for the British-built railway. The railroad opened the area to colonization, but the villagers' impact on timber and wildlife was low. From 1945 to 1988, villagers became the primary force of landscape degradation. The post-war windfall of firearms increased hunting pressure, and populations of large mammal started to decline.
With the economic decline of the 1970s and 1980s, the comunity's demand for game and forest products intensified, and the large mammal fauna was reduced from eleven to four species.
From 1988-2003, the forests surrounding the sanctuary were fragmented and degraded. The absence of large predators re-dered the park safe for livestock, and the combined effects of grazing and removal of forest products seriously degraded habitat within CWS. Major threats to CWS during the past two de-decades have resulted from land use decisions in which government-planned economic enterprises caused encroachment by villagers. Stabilization and recovery of this sanctuary will require management compatible with human needs, including expanded buffer zones, better core area protection, community forestry projects, and probably relocation of villages within the park.

Abstract: Forests can provide refuge, funds, and food for combatants in civil war. Insurgents may also use forested regions to hide from government troops and the government may choose to ignore them if they remain in remote forested regions. Case studies of Burma, Cambodia, and other countries show that forest resources have served to fuel armed conflict. Several scholars and NGOs have portrayed this as a world-wide problem, but there are hardly any relevant statistical studies. This article first develops theoretically the different mechanisms relating forest resources to conflict. It then looks at the empirical relationship for the onset and duration of conflict at the country level and finds very little support for a general and direct relationship. At this level, it would appear that many have generalized too hastily from the case studies. The analysis then moves to the disaggregated level and looks at the duration of conflict when forest resources are available in forested regions. Case studies of Burma, Cambodia, and other countries show that forest resources have served to fuel armed conflict. Several scholars and NGOs have portrayed this as a world-wide problem, but there are hardly any relevant statistical studies. This article first develops theoretically the different mechanisms relating forest resources to conflict. At this level, it would appear that many have generalized too hastily from the case studies. The analysis then moves to the disaggregated level and looks at the duration of conflict when forest resources are available in the conflict zone. Again, no general relationship is found. We find that a shorter distance to the coast tends to make the conflict zone. Again, no general relationship is found. We find that a shorter distance to the coast tends to make the conflicts in forested conflict zones longer. On the other hand many of the significant results we find are driven by one or two cases. While several generalizations from case studies seem overly ambitious, a more careful modeling of the mechanisms revealed by the cases finds some support in the statistical study. – BL-DSL Subject(s): Earth sciences, Geography GB:BL-DSL(6543.885950)

Burma in the anti-fascist war / Robert H. Taylor.
Herbert 277 : <This essay challenges standard assumptions about the nature of pre- and postwar Burmese politics and provides a fresh assessment of the 'Japanese interregnum' period in Burmese history, Taylor argues that new political forces emerged in this period which created the conditions for Burma’s still unresolved civil war. He examines the creation of the Burma Independence Army by the Japanese, the motivation and ideology of its leaders, the formation of the Anti-Fascist Organisation (AFO) in August 1944, and the Communists’ role in organizing resistance to the Japanese.>

Ceasefire capitalism: military-private partnerships, resource concessions and military-state building in the Burma-China borderlands.

In: Journal of peasant studies (ISSN 0306-6150) 38.4 2011, 747-770

Abstract: Since ceasefire agreements were signed between the Burmese military government and ethnic political groups in the Burma-China borderlands in the early 1990s, violent waves of counterinsurgency development have replaced warfare to target politically-suspect, resource-rich, ethnic populated borderlands. The Burmese regime allocates land concessions in ceasefire zones as an explicit postwar military strategy to govern land and populations to produce regulated, legible, militarized territory. Tracing the relationship of military-state formation, land control and securitization, and primitive accumulation in the Burma-China borderlands uncovers the forces of what I am calling 'ceasefire capitalism'. This study examines these processes of Burmese military-state building over the past decade in resource-rich ethnic ceasefire zones along the Yunnan, China border. I will illustrate this contemporary and violent military-state formation process with two case studies focusing on northern Burma: logging and redirected timber trade flows, and Chinese rubber plantations as part of China's opium substitution program.

Sbrega 1097: <With research through Japanese sources, Yoon traces Japanese wartime policies in Burma. By dissolving the Burmese government and creating a military administration, the local Japanese commander contributed to a Burmese uprising (the Anti-Fascist People’s Freedom League). The sudden Japanese decision to grant independence – an independene without sovereignty – came too late. According th the author, Japan probably could have retained Burmese support if independence had been granted in March 1942.>
