Semblance of civilian control

Military elections and the latest coup conspiracy in Pakistan

BY MO STOBBERGS

WASHINGTON

Pakistan is a classic example of a military-dominated state in which the military perceives itself as the sole guarantor of the country's national security and political stability. The country has experienced several coups, and the current political instability is a result of the latest military intervention in the country's politics.

The military has played a significant role in Pakistan's political history, and it continues to wield considerable influence over the country's political and social landscape. The military's intervention in the country's politics is a matter of concern for the international community and raises questions about the country's commitment to democratic governance.

In recent years, Pakistan has witnessed several efforts to establish civilian control over the military. However, the military's involvement in the country's politics remains a major challenge for the country's democratic institutions.

The military's role in Pakistan's politics is not only limited to the establishment of civilian control. The military also plays a significant role in the country's foreign policy, and it has been involved in several military interventions in the region.

In conclusion, the military's role in Pakistan's politics is a matter of concern for the international community. The country's democratic institutions need to take strong measures to ensure that the military's role in the country's politics does not undermine the country's democratic institutions.

The military's role in Pakistan's politics is a matter of concern for the international community. The country's democratic institutions need to take strong measures to ensure that the military's role in the country's politics does not undermine the country's democratic institutions.